The realistic fiction book, Girl in Pieces, by Kathleen Glasglow is one of the best books I’ve ever read. I became interested in the book when my best friend recommended it to me.

This book is about a girl named Charlie Davis who was living at a rehab facility for girls who self-harm. All of a sudden, she can’t stay any longer because of a money issue. Charlie is forced to leave everything she knows and the help she still needs. She moves in with her old best friend across the country where she has to try and start a new life without self-harming.

This book reminds me of All the Bright Places by Jennifer Niven. The type of person to enjoy this kind of book would be someone who needs a good cry.

I like the cover of this book because the words fade downward and there are thin red lines signifying the cuts she used to make on her skin. I loved this book; it’s one of my favorites! I would definitely recommend Girl in Pieces.
